This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1898 edition. Excerpt: ... VI Our principal want the first few days out was meat. We could get from the negroes almost everything else we needed in sufficient quantities, but of meat we got none of any kind, from the fact that they had none themselves, nor had they, as a general rule, had any for two years, in consequence of the demands of the army. Our appetites cruelly teased us night and day for something to supply muscle. To meet this demand, two or three times, we visited hen-roosts with ' felonious intent," but were each time disturbed by dogs, and out of distinguished consideration for the rest and quietude of these quadrupeds, we forebore any further enterprises of that sort. But a capital idea struck Goode one night, as we came upon a flock of geese sitting in the road. "Say, boys! let's have a goose for tomorrow." We could almost taste the savory "sentinel of Rome" in the very mention of him. Certainly, everybody was agreed, and the leader led us back the road to prepare for a capture. The geese were sitting so close to a house that it was thought safer for us to drive them up the road out of hearing of the people. So at it we went, whispering "shoow, shoow, shoow," but the offended family, instead of walking quietly off at command, set up an uproarious "hut, tut, tut, tut," which succeeded in repulsing us completely. We fell back a few rods for another council, and this time it was decided that we should walk up abreast and simultaneously fire a volley of clubs into their ranks. Our walking-sticks were the very things, heavy enough to be deadly, and they were used. Whiz went the canes, bang agafnst the fence one or two of them, and off went the geese, noisier than before, not one of them harmed. It was too bad, but enough to frighten us all away but...
